Once upon a time, at the edge of a deep green forest, lived a child who always wore a bright red cape. Everyone called him Little Red Riding Hood.

One morning his mother packed a basket with fresh bread and honey cakes. “Grandmother is ill,” she said. “Take her this.”

“Stay on the path,” said Mother, “and don't stop to talk to strangers.” Little Red promised.

The path wound deep into the forest, where the trees grew tall and the birds sang high above.

Then, from behind a tree, stepped a wolf with a big friendly smile.
“Good morning, little one!”

“Where are you going with that lovely basket?” asked the wolf.
“To Grandmother's cottage, past the three oak trees,” said Little Red.

“Why not pick her some flowers?” said the wolf. “Look how pretty they are!” And he slipped away between the trees.

Little Red wandered off the path, picking bluebells and buttercups, and forgot all about the time.

Meanwhile, the wolf raced ahead to Grandmother's cottage and knocked on the door. Tap, tap, tap.

Grandmother peeked out, saw the wolf, and hid in the wardrobe, quick as a mouse.

The wolf put on Grandmother's nightcap and spectacles, climbed into her bed, and pulled the covers up to his nose.

Soon Little Red arrived with the basket and a big bunch of flowers.
The door was open, so he stepped inside.

“Grandmother, what big ears you have!” “All the better to hear you with, my dear.”

“Grandmother, what big eyes you have!” “All the better to see you with, my dear.”

“Grandmother, what big TEETH you have!” “All the better to EAT you with!”

Out of the bed leapt the wolf! Little Red dropped the basket and ran, shouting, “Help! Help!”

A woodcutter working nearby heard the cry and came running through the door.

The wolf took one look at the woodcutter, jumped out of the window, and ran into the forest. He was never seen again.

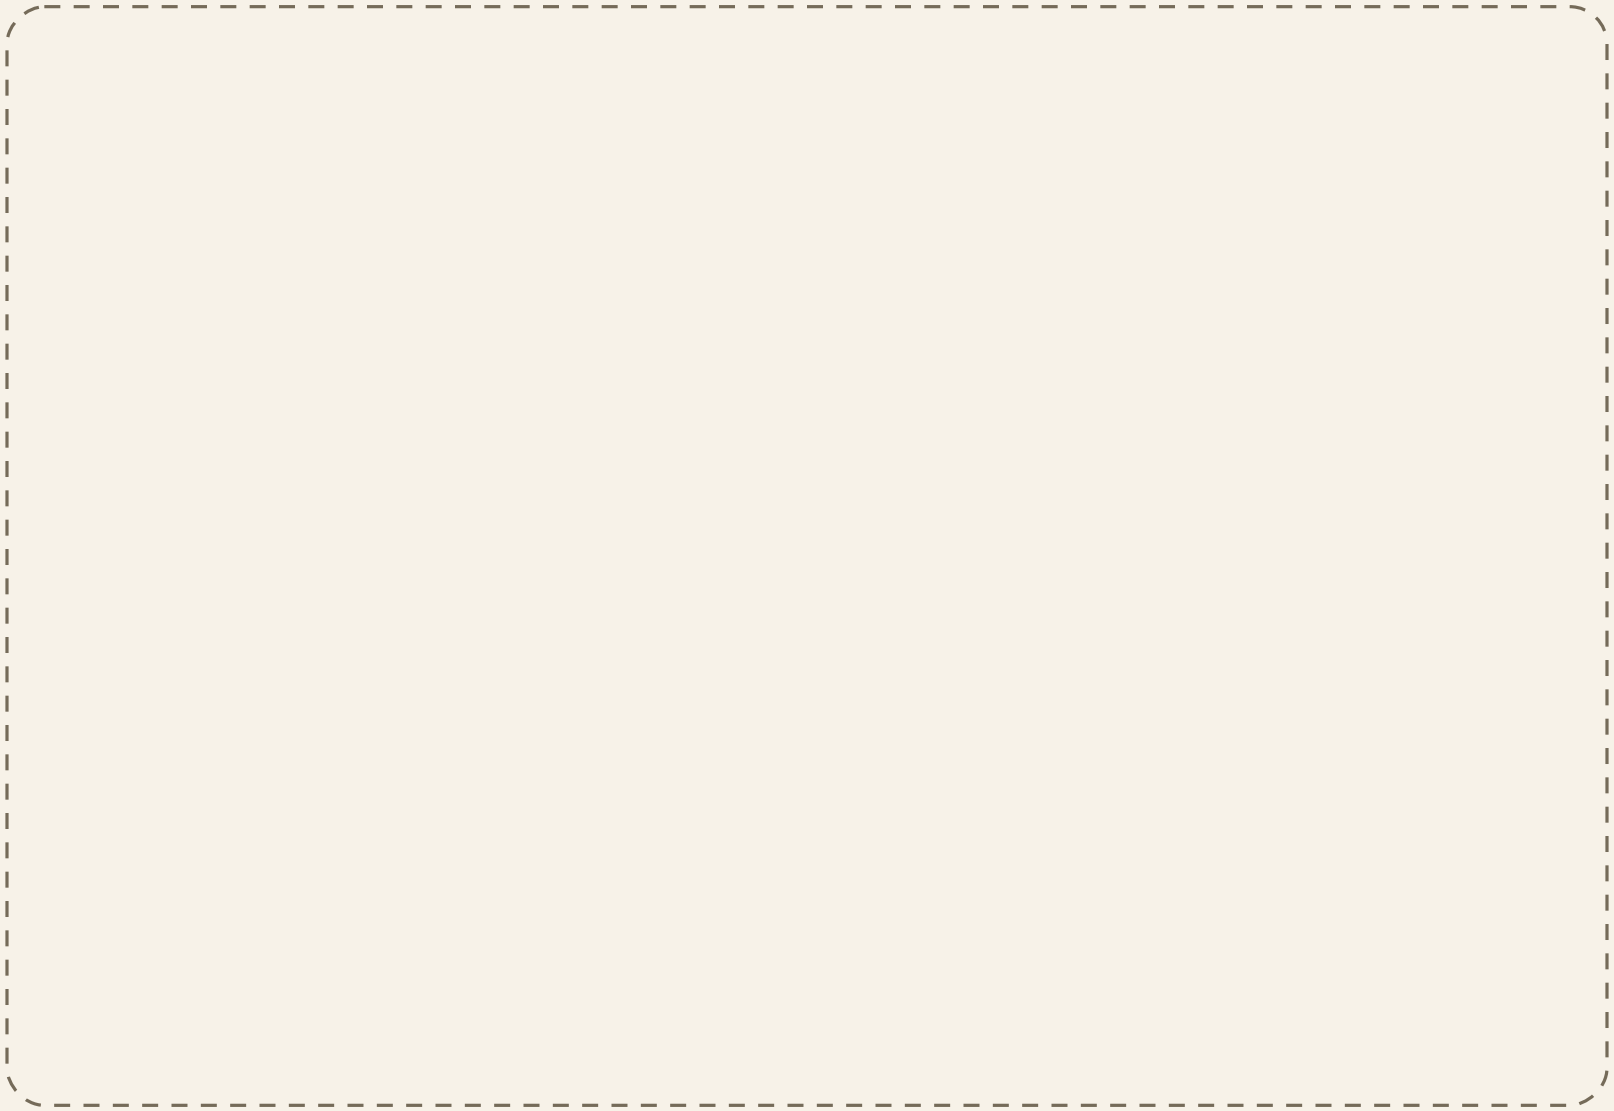

Out of the wardrobe climbed Grandmother. “My brave little one!” she said, and hugged Little Red tight.

They shared the honey cakes by the fire. And Little Red never, ever strayed from the path again. The End.
